when she was so old.

It was midsummer, and mamma had gone away to the mountains, taking Katie with her, and leaving Julie at home with her nurse and papa. Julie wished very much to go with mamma, for she had been in the country, and the remembrance of it was like the prettiest dream she ever had; the gay, green fields where the brooks played at hide-and-seek in the grasses, and the long, samny meadows filled with daises and buttercups, that were like so many bright winking eyes, looking at the sky all day, and shutting themselves up at night so that they could never see the stars as long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. But, after all, it was long as they lived. that they could never see the stars as long as they lived. But, after all, it was very grand to remain at home and be papa's little housekeeper; for mamma had impressed upon her mind, very deeply, how necessary it was that some one should stay and care for poor papa while she was away, and Julie took up her new duties with great importance. Biddy gave her a bunch of keys, which she wore dangling at her little waist. she wore dangling at her little waist, while she went about "seeing to things," just like mamma, for all the world. one Sunday afternoon Julie got tired of staying in the house, and coaxed Nora the nurse, to take her out into the park, which was a little way up the street from her papa's house. It was a pleasant place, that pretty, green park, lined with great trees and so bright with flowers—flowers that you musn't touch for your life, however; and many a little bird, who lived away off in some country orchard, came there on sunny days to sing; and many a little bee left the scented bean-flowers and golden squash blossoms of some cottage garden, and made a fleet voyage through the air to taste the dainty lips of those more aristocratic blossoms. Then there was a fountain that kept talking and murmuring in its drowsy way, as if it were trying to tell fairy stories. Julie made believe that it did. The bees were working that day just the same as if it wasn't ing that day just the same as if it wasn't in the face, he said: "Very weel pitched; but then how are ye going to get over yersel'?"

Julie liked with the owner of the garden. "And better then on any better the secondary better the se vegetables and borne many bright blossoms. It boasted of its beauty and strength, and claimed to be a favorite with the owner of the garden. "And the park on Sunday better than on any other day; for if one must be still, and not hop about on one foot, nor play with dolls, nor roll hoop upon the sidewalk, it is better to be still where there is something to see and to hear, and so she sat with infinite content on a low seat near the fountain, keeping very still to listen to its murmur, and watch the bright spray that changed to rainbow colors in the sunshine, until it grew toward evening.

"Turk's a very stunid brute of yours"

But poor Nora the nurse was listening to the vesper bells that were just begining to call people to church, and wishing that she might go, too, with the crowd of people who were already on their way. But it was of no use, for all the rest of the servants had a holiday that day, and there was no one to leave Julie with.

"No, honey, it would never do in the world. Your papa is away and the house would be left alone entirely, and what would serve a mite as yersiff do to keep away the fairies?"

"Poh,'' said Julie, bravely, "I'm not afraid of the fairies; they don't steal children here as they do in Ireland—our fairies are good, mamma says so."

But Nora would not consent to her staying alone, though Julie persisted that side must, for a long time, for, besides wishing to be kind to Nora, she thought it would be very grand to keep looke a whole evening all by herself.

The last footstep pattered out onto the sidewalk, and the sext on, after putting things to rights about the best manner and on good soil. In larvesting, too, locking the great door, and leaving the church in silence and darkness.

A clock struck somewhere, with loud, distinct strokes, and Julie, stirring uneasily in her sleep, her head, which was propped up against a pew cushion, fell with a jar against the hard wall, and she awoke and looked around her in bewild-erment, and for a few moments had no idea where she could be, it was so strange to be sitting up in the night with one's things on.
